Elizabeth Blackwell left England in 1832. She was just 11 years old when she arrived in New York City. The streets were quiet. Few people were around. Most of them were sick. They had cholera. Those who were not sick stayed inside their houses. They didn't want to catch it. Blackwell wanted to help the sick people get well, but she was just a girl.

She never forgot her dream of helping the sick. When she grew up, a friend fell ill. Blackwell nursed her back to health. She told her friend that she wanted to be a doctor.

At that time, few women went to college. None had ever earned a medical degree. Blackwell studied the same books that the medical students did. She paid doctors to teach her. Soon she was ready for medical school. At first no college would let her in. It took her years to convince Geneva Medical College to let her try. Then the teachers and students were mean to her. To please them, Blackwell had to work harder. She earned high marks.

In 1849, Blackwell was the first women in the United States to graduate as a medical doctor, but no one would hire her. Yet Blackwell did not give up.
